[11/3, 7:37 PM] Brenda: The nursing profession in Cameroon has a history that dates back to the colonial era. Here is an overview of the history of nursing in Cameroon:

1. Early Colonial Period: During the early colonial period, healthcare in Cameroon was primarily provided by European medical personnel. Local women often assisted in basic nursing tasks in makeshift medical facilities.
2. 1920s-1940s: The first formal training programs for nursing in Cameroon were established in the 1920s. These programs were mainly focused on providing basic nursing education to local women. They were offered by religious organizations and aimed to meet the healthcare needs of the population.
3. 1950s-1970s: In the 1950s, the first nursing schools owned by the government were established. These schools were designed to provide comprehensive training to nurses and improve the quality of healthcare in Cameroon. The schools also aimed to increase the number of local nurses to address the shortage of healthcare professionals.
4. Post-Independence Era: Following Cameroon's independence in 1960, efforts were made to further develop the nursing profession. The government increased investments in nursing education and expanded nursing schools across the country.
5. Professional Regulation and Development: In 1986, the Cameroon Nursing Council (CNC) was created to regulate and promote the nursing profession. The CNC strives to ensure the standards of nursing practice and education are upheld. It also licenses nurses and provides continuing education opportunities.
6. Present Day: The nursing profession in Cameroon continues to evolve. The government has implemented various initiatives to improve the quality of nursing education, increase the number of nurses, and enhance healthcare delivery in the country.
